owned by the Rev. Jehiel P. Hendee, father of the distinguished lawyer and statesman ex-Gov. George W. clergyman of the Christian denomipaper published by him was not devoted to general news but to the dissemination of views of that sect of religionists. It was a modest sheet and compared with the bed blanket publications of to-day would not be imposing. Perhaps the good seed sown by it may have helped to produce the pervasion of Christian spirit which is so rife in this community. It was called the Christian Summary.

I do not propose to say much of the lawyers who have appeared in this town, but I wish to speak of the first two. The first lawyer who came to live and practice in this town was Augustus Young. He came in 1812 Augustus Young. He came in 1812 or '13. He was a young man of good talent and an excellent scholar, though perhaps not overstocked with though perhaps not overstocked with vim and ready action. He remained The night was dark, the rain fell in torrents here but about two years and then removed to Orleans county in this State, where he was twice elected to Congress, a Representative. He afterwards removed to Johnson in this county where he continued some of them poorly clothed and some scarcely should be book and some of them poorly clothed and some scarcely should be book and the sound th practice and published a book entitled "Unity of Purpose," of which he was the author. Its composition showed him to be a man familiar with the learning of the schools, but how sound his reasoning and conclusions were I was not prepared to judge, as I found it difficult to understand him. He boldly attacked some of the favorite doctrines of the old philosophers, among them Kepler, and seemed to think he had swept them all away. Before the expiration of another hundred years this book may be brought to light and the full discovery made that Young was right.

Connected with Mr. Young's pracwhich considerably amused me when told by an early settler. One Elias Kingsley who lived on what is called West Hill, lost a sheep, perhaps the only one he had. There was found on the premises of a neighbor, Andrew Luce, a sheep's head which Kingsley thought came off of his lost sheep. He employed Young to commence a suit against Luce. Luce employed Judge R. G. Buckley of Waterbury to defend, Young became a little nervous about the case and induced his client to engage Judge Carpenter, also of Waterbury, to assist. On trial one Samuel Robinson swore that he had often seen Kingsley's sheep and noticed he had a peculiar shaped nose, very large and Roman in form, like the one found and produced on trial. Judge Bulkley had an extraordinary development of nasal souse, a huge nose. was a very singular and unsatisfactory way to prove the identity of a sheep by the shape and size of his nose after death. Replying to this argument Judge Carpenter claimed there was nothing singular or unsatisfactory about it; that he could swear to the identity of his brother Bulkley by his nose if he had been dead six months.

A considerable crowd were present to witness A considerable crowd were present to witness the sport and the joke created the most bursting jollity. In those days the best blackguard won his cases in the lower courts and Kingsley triumphed, probably without right. Soon after Young left Mr. Wm. Richardson came to supply his place. He married a daughter of Nathaniel Butts, before named, by whom he had fivechildren. When the bryings of his profession did not be the profession. the business of his profession did not take all his time he worked on farms. About 1826 he went to Burlington on some business and it was ascertained that he crossed Lake Champlain. He never returned and none of his friends ever obtained any trace of him. Whether he fell a victim to sudden, fatal dis-ease or "fell among thieves," or like Enoch of old, was deemed worthy to be translated, may not be known till Heaven's jewels are counted up. There may be some in this assemblage who like a hunting story. Out of three or four good ones they have a right to one or two. Gov. Butler, who was fond of taking large game, came out from Waterof taking large game, came out from Water-bury one day in 1800 and killed a large moose not many rods from the present resi-dence of Alvin Wilkins. In the winter of 1805 6 James Wilkins, Uriah Wilkins, Ezra Wilkins and Ephraim Horn were on the hog-back Mountain hunting deer, then considerable plenty there. When in the vicinity of "Hull's brook" in the town of Worcester they discovered that a moose had passed. They were all natural bunters, and when they saw the great tracks their blood was up, and they could hardly restrain themselves from starting off like hounds just let loose from the leash.

They finally held a hunter's council. It was late in the day; their rations were nearly exhausted. So three of the party commenced preparations for camping, and Uriah Wilkins came home, a distance probably of a dozen miles, for supplies of food. As soon as practicable it was prepared and, without a moment's sleep, he immediately started back. In the morning the camping party commenced the pursuit of the moose with their dogs, which soon overtook the moose; but often he turned back and kept them as but often he turned back and kept them at bay and then passed on again. These stops gave the hunters time to come up and the moose was overtaken by them near night in the town of Calais. When they first saw him he was on a side hill and by his fearfully powerful demonstrations was keeping the dogs at a respectful distance. As the moose turned with his head towards the posts when he at a respectful distance. As the moose turned with his head towards the party, when he first discovered them. Horn aimed a bullet at the middle of his forehead. At the discharge of the gun the moose fell to the ground but immediately rose again. Thereupon Ezra Wilkins fired his gun and happened to cut the jugular vein. So then the moose soon bled to death. When they skinned him they found Horn's bullet was well aimed, but it did not penetrate the skull. The moose was the largest one ever killed in this part of the State. Uriah Wilkins overtook the party State. Uriah Wilkins overtook the party about midnight on the day they killed the moose. They returned by way of Montpelier, bringing the meat and skin on a sled.

I will omit the particulars of a very excit ing hunt for a large gray wolf, in which most of the men and grown up boys of the town participated. But we have the greatest bear story that the world can produce, very intelligent, full readers of that kind of lore have often so said. The full particulars are given in an article, published in the Lamoille.

to give them here. We have all read or heard of old Gen. Putnam's going into a cave and shooting a wolf, when the dogs would not enter. Well, that was a baby performance Hendee, to whose silvery voice you compared with our great bear hunt, which took place 45 years ago the e-suing winter. Everything about it is great. The hunt was a clergyman of the Christian denomi. clergyman of the Christian denomi-nation, and, as I understand, the fight with them there, two were driven into one cave and one into another. The cave, a deep one, was several times entered by one of the bouters with great difficulty, and the bears, two of them, were shot by him and one by one dragged from the cave with such assistance as the two others could render. They weighed about 200 pounds each and were brought off of the mountain that night, a distance of four miles.

Allusion to the military history of Stowe in the war of 1812 at Plattsburgh is not made on account of any brilliant performance of its men in the field of battle, but to show the kind of stuff the early settlers were made of-their pluck and their constant and in-domitable perseverance and endurance under adverse circumstances and great difficulties. When the battle of Plattsburgh took place there were two companies in town called the "Light Infantry" and the "Floodwood." Besides these there were a few men who be-longed to a company in Washington county called the "Light Horse." The British came and the roads were very muddy. No military officers attempted to call out any man or exa half made muddy road through the dense woods which enclosed it nearly all the way, with the rain descending as for a freshet upon their half protected bodies. They reached Waterbury at about daylight and there found portions of companies from Montpelier and other towns gathered on a piece of ground in a kind of parade, and Col. piece of ground in a kind of parade, and Col.
John was making a speech to them. The Stowe men joined the throng and by Col.
Peck's advice they proceeded to Burlington without observing any particular order, obtaining small quantities of food in houses as they passed. At that time a man by the name of Eldridge kept a hotel some three miles out of Burlington. The men asked permission to rest their tired limbs on his premises that night. He refused leave but permission to rest their tired limbs on his premises that night. He refused leave but disregarding that they filled his barns and sheds with lodgers. In the morning some of the Stowe men found that a flock of turkies had occupied a higher position through the night than they had.

burgh, but declined to advise others to go or not go. To ascertain who was disposed to go with him he requested that the men should form a line and when he pronounced the word "march," those who declined to go should step three paces to the rear. More than one-half remained firm in their position At this time there were at Burlington 150 men from Stowe. Some started later in the night than the first squad and some the next day. The Stowe men all submitted to the command of the Captain of the light intantry company. They drew their rations, procured some beef and pork and a large kettle in which to boil their meat, but before it was half cooked the drum called them to the wharf to be ready for crossing. In great confusion they strung the half cooked meat in bags upon their shoulders and as they went the grease ran down their backs and dropped on their heels. Large loaves of bread were carried by thrusting a stick through them and shouldaring them. As they went they drew their guns. Friday about sun down as many as could be taken went aboard the open top sail boat, which, when viewed a little distance from the shore looked like a sheep yard. After about two hours' sailing the boat was becalmed and be-In his argument he insisted that it gas to leak. To make any progress the men was a very singular, and unsatisfacto, were called upon by turns to bail and row all night. About daybreak they reached Ketch-um's Landing in Peru, not deeming it pru-dent to go direct to Plattsburgh. Forty men from Stowe crossed in the boat. More came over Saturday and Sunday tollowing. The main battle was fought and the British de-feated on Sunday. The more from Store feated on Sunday. The men from Stowe were not engaged in action but they were in The men from Stowe situations of danger and among the flying bombs and bullets. None were killed or se-riously wounded.

The record of Stowe in the war to put down the rebellion is thought to be highly creditable. All the calls of the government for soldiers were promptly met, and at the close of the war Stowe had a credit reckoned in years, and including 13 men who enlisted for three years in the regular army, of 87 years. Of the men who went forth from Stowe to take part in that terrible stuggle it may be said with entire truth that no braver men ever faced the perils of war. Their valor fully sustained the glorious reputation of the Green Mountain Boys. One of Stowe's boys who colisted at the age of 18 and served nearly four years, carried the colors of his regiment and at the battle of Petersburgh placed them on the enemy's breastworks. In ognition of which and his unflinehing dis charge of duty he was promoted to a first lieutenantcy. This is but a single instance. An examination of the very able and complete report and record of Hov.Robt. Savage included in the history of Stowe will show that it is almost invidious to single out any particular Stowe soldier. I am happy to assure the people of Stowe that provision has been made for rescuing the story of these noble lives from time's oblivious obscuration and to perpetuate their name and fame to the latest posterity.
I had contemplated a few words on the natural advantages of Stowe as a residence, but I am reminded that I have already taken time that belongs to others, and I abruptly
